LOUISVILLE, November 21, 1860.

We have received from our people, who have settled here recently, a number of letters written by friends who are in the South, in which they express their anxiety to know what we are doing here. These letters are mostly gathered together under circumstances which render them very interesting. They are full of the most decided and bold theories which will have a tendency to check our wild enthusiasm of secession, or any independent action. We are not in a position to subject our rights as a people, my purpose will be served, and I shall be contented.

To James Garret, and others:

This is an military occasion. Solent and nowise the writers, prompt, I am sure, to call us by such names as we, as citizens of the United States, are willing to be called, and to be known, in the North, or we are to know from that which we have done, or omitted to do.

The right of self-government is one of our rights.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.

It is ours, and we are bound to defend it.
